CRITICISM Elden Ring Cracked Version game: PLAYERS' REVIEWS ELDEN RING game: EXPLORATION ELDEN RING game: OPINIONS ELDEN RING game: MAIN STORY ELDEN RING game: DINOSAUR DOME TOWER ELDEN RING game: MENU ELDEN RING game: VISIT DAILY FANTASY LEAGUE PORTALOffer.com, a Boulder-based online sales site, reported Wednesday that it was breached, the second such incident at the firm in the past two months. The hackers used a host of basic security holes to gain access to the site's systems, which compromised personal information of about four million registered users. The breach was discovered early Wednesday morning and was fixed by 8 p.m., according to the company. The hacker has not yet been identified. The company will notify its affected customers directly. The breach is the second in recent weeks at an online sales site, and it is reminiscent of attacks on other industry giants, including Heartland Payment Systems, which was hit in January, and Target, which was breached last fall. Derek Banal, a risk management analyst at Grant Thornton, said the incidents could be simple mistakes — such as a poorly configured firewall — but there could also be sophisticated hackers at work. "It's hard to say," he said. "We don't want to jump to conclusions, but we do find them interesting because a lot of times they're not the big expensive cyber-attacks. They're just trying to get cash." "At some point we're going to be bigger than every single one of these issues put together," he added. "There's a lot of people who are scared to do business." Heartland was also the target of data theft in 2009 and 2010, according to a criminal complaint filed with the U.S. District Court in Seattle, and it has twice faced federal prosecutors for processing payments of stolen data without knowing the source. "The trend is not the hackers are getting better, but we're not getting better at spotting them," said Dave Aitel, a computer scientist at the National Institute of Standards and Technology.
