While the Court won't officially overturn the ban — unless the justices, as expected, vote to do so, which they have not done yet — the Court may eventually have the opportunity to weigh in on the question. In 2006, voters approved Proposition 8, which amended the state constitution to create the ban on same-sex marriage. Today's decision by the California Supreme Court was the culmination of a high-profile and contentious legal battle that has left the state divided and led to multiple trials, appeals and rulings. At issue is whether the ban on same-sex marriage is constitutional. The state Court of Appeal, in a 2-1 ruling, ruled that the ban is unconstitutional. The issue will now be reviewed by the Supreme Court. On Thursday, the Court was reviewing a preliminary injunction issued by San Francisco Superior Court Judge Vaughn Walker, who had ruled that Proposition 8 violated the state constitution. Today, the Supreme Court issued a brief order that said that the Court would not grant review of the lower court decision, but it agreed to hear arguments on the issue in February. That said, the Court did not remove the decision from the lower court, so it could still be appealed. "Two events have created a unique situation that compels us to exercise our discretion to review the state court of appeal's decision," Chief Justice Tani Cantil-Sakauye and Justice Joyce L. Kennard wrote in the order. "First, this court has never before reviewed a decision by a state court of appeal or the superior court that applies, first and foremost, the California Constitution to determine the validity of a state constitutional amendment. Second, all of the pertinent events have occurred within the past six months." While the final decision to overturn the ban would be made by the justices, the case likely will provide the justices with a chance to weigh in on the issue of same-sex marriage. "We will review the state court of appeal's decision, but we won't review the trial court's opinion," said Kate Kendell, 0cc13bf012
