countries whose apple production is much higher per capita than that of its big brother, the United States, may not be as dull as it seems. After the United States, Germany enjoys the third-highest production in the world. In 2009, it produced 10.24 million tonnes of apples, behind only China (17.8m tonnes) and Russia (9.45m tonnes). But to the chagrin of two German states, apples may be becoming a thing of the past. The Bundestag, Germany's parliament, has launched a major battle against ageing apple growers who are suffering financially from low prices, tight supply and new competitors. But instead of reducing output, what is happening is that the number of apple growers in Germany is falling. According to the Chamber of German Applegrowers, the number of active growers fell by 1.7 per cent between 2005 and 2010 to around 4,500. The number of German apple growers peaked in 1990 at almost 30,000. This is a crucial problem, the government insists, because Germany has no spare capacity to grow its own apples. But only a fraction of all produce from the country is eaten domestically. Around 80 per cent ends up overseas, while exports account for a fifth of GDP, not counting taxes and subsidies. "Germany's production c6a93da74d
